THE HOME STRAIGHT

295

The site of the Old Pool was bypassed on the south side by the Batchley Brook which then entered a long "bottle" pond which formed the headrace for Forge Mill. The inlet and outflow of the pond were originally both at the west end, so unless the mill was working there was no flow. Unfortunately, recent developments have led to a reduction in efficiency of the water supply. In 1988 the "Tarnshaw's Island" was constructed and the supply of water to the mill was expanded to a few yards west of a long dyke under the island. After that the flow to Forge Mill was never really adequate.

FORGE MILL

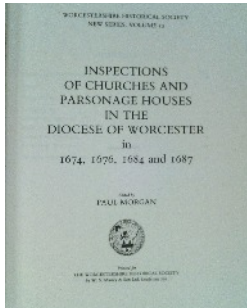

Forge Mill is unique in the valley in that it is still in working order. Last used commercially as a textile spinning mill in 1928, it was maintained for some time by volunteers before being converted into a working museum. With the cessation of the water flow of the pond the watercourses are all such as they were in the early 19th century when a new 16ft diameter water wheel was installed. The site of the wheel and the inlet head of water required the dyke to have the wheel chamber below surface level in a tunnel so as to give, as far as possible, unimpeded flow. This was also the case at the now demolished Old Mill. At Forge Mill the tunnel discharges into a perfectly straight channel which cuts an impressive narrow channel in the valley floor. Batchley Brook, at this stage essentially an overflow from the Forge Mill pond, augmented by the "Red Ditch" leaves the dyke about 250 yards downstream, having first crossed it by means of an abutment.

The original course of Batchley Brook turned right, well west of the Arrow and followed a winding course across the fields, which can still be traced. In 1833 a sluice cut was made into the Arrow to allow water from the brook to augment the flow to Batchley Paper Mill.

At the present confluence both streams are typically flowing in artificial channels. Only four miles away in a direct line, but just out of sight over the west of the hill is Couda Croft.

In 1888 the Batchley footpaths, three hundred yards below the confluence of the two streams, were destroyed by a flood, and the level of the Arrow was lowered by several feet. The dam was not completely reconstructed and as a result the Arrow no longer supplies the Batchley paper mill pond downstream. However the surviving part of the structure was made safe and now forms an attractive feature known as the Tunnels.
